Hearing voices

People that hear voices telling them to do things are considered to be crazy and should be either heavily medicated or locked away, for their own safety and well being of course. Society finds these people all so scary, they are just imagining things that are not real, they could harm themselves or the people around them and that is a risk society will not take.

But how about all these incredible inventive writers, that create books and shows on television or write Oscar winning scenarios for film? To what extent are they not just hearing those same voices telling them what to put on paper, what to think of next. And we all love it, the violence, the mystery and misery, a close up of other people's lives. The weirder the plot, the more ingenious the art direction and the special effects, the more people will go out and watch the show. Filmmakers are not locked away for all their cruel and violent fantasies, as a matter of fact most of them live a very luxurious lives because of all their horrific thoughts and ideas.

A child with an imaginary friend is taken to a psychiatrist, for that child must have a mental disorder. Quite a few of such children must be abused or neglected by their parents, for why else would they be so caught up in a fantasy world. Normal children find other children to play with, not some fairy tale creature like an elf, an Angel or a troll...

And yet again there are people that get away with talking to beings from the other side. There are quite a few psychics that channel their messages; there are quite a few people that can talk to the dead. These people may be called eccentrics, they might be called odd, or at least a little bit weird, but they are free to go as they please. And some of those people are making a fortune too...

It is quite a pity that people that have not yet learned to be in charge of their contacts with the other side are called lunatics or madmen, whereas those who can are often worshipped and called sane. All it takes is some help to make those lunatics take control of their own lives again, let them boss around those voices rather than having it the other way. I think the key to their 'healing' is not to lock them away, but to teach them how to deal with their lives that are more complex because they are so much more 5D than most of us. In the end there must be something we can learn from them. I know I would love to actually hear the voice of my guardian Angel!
