Career Shifts

When I look around me I must conclude that most of my befriended lightworkers are drifting towards new careers. All that they ever dreamt of is coming true, no matter what they planned or thought up for themselves; most of them are becoming very successful therapists or writers, despite second thoughts on money, responsibilities and status.

Some of them never planned to be a therapist, some of them always dreamt of becoming one. Some deliberately gave up their day jobs; some 'unwillingly' lost theirs and then began their new challenge. And most of them are really really good at it as well. 5D is adding a lot of value to therapy and counselling.

I envy them, in a positive sense, all of them moving towards their true passion. Some of them are finding their true passion for the very first time. Some deliberately taking the big step, some reluctantly leaving everything else behind. And even though some of them are scared as hell, they take responsibility for their own destiny and they do it well.

When I look around me I must conclude that my own career seems to be moving in the opposite direction. I reluctantly feel I am drifting away from being a therapist. And it is not because I am no good at it, and it is not because I don't like to be one...but merely because it is not meant to be, or at least not now.

I once thought I was going to be a therapist, a part-time therapist that is, but still a good one, working hard, being committed, doing well. But within the foreseeable future I won't be one. I will stay in business, working hard as a young urban professional, which feels funny and a bit awkward for that is not who I thought I was, not who I really am.

I am a lightworker and it is both my wish and my destiny to be involved in humanity's shift towards the fifth dimension. Some of us will help people one-on-one, whereas others will take on different roles within society, each one of us spreading light, each one of us standing up straight, empowered and empowering, willing to make a difference. No matter what our roles will be they will be of equal importance and we will all play them well. And so it is.
