Semantics

This is a simple plea for all semantics to become redundant, for all words to become unnecessary and for all rational thoughts to become obsolete.

This is a simple plea for no more misunderstanding between people that love each other so dearly but who cannot stop themselves from misinterpreting each other's good intentions and thoughts.

Just take a simple word and try to identify its definition. You may feel tempted to look it up in a dictionary. Ever tried to look up that missing word from a foreign language text in a dictionary? You must be very skilled not to be misled...a true interpreter only cross checks his translations, but is never led by a dictionary.

Most words justify multiple definitions, so it all comes down to what the writer intended and how the reader interprets that intended.

This goes not only for written words, but also for spoken words in any discussion. So in communications, it is all about intent.

Communications...that is where beliefs on truth and good intent slip in. Yet there is no such thing as just one truth. Truths may be conflicting and, moreover, "the truth" may hurt. Your truth may differ from mine and you may not like the truth I wish to believe in, but as we get closer and into the fifth dimension, the multiplicity of truth becomes ever more apparent.

In addition to that, people may have conflicting belief systems. I choose not to believe in evil and bad intent, which in my truth is all based on fear, the fear of being betrayed or misled, the fear of not knowing.

In some cases doubt arises due to an unclear conscious. And when confronted with somebody else's truth I may be tempted to start doubting, including myself, all over again.

Words are used to describe thoughts and emotions. Words are often abused to achieve goals. They are translations and interpretations of what cannot be captured in words. Thus it would be so much easier if we could leave those words for what they are and go beyond the words and find true love and understanding...right from where it really matters: the heart.
