

nicky

Fast Forward Thinking

My mind is on full throttle, I can barely keep up myself. Once again, I find myself moving back and forth between the first and the last words of a sentence said by my companion. I have to bite my tongue not to start answering a question before it is being asked. Plus I really need to focus on actually answering questions before moving on to the next topic.

I find myself to being impatient; I feel that I have seen it all before. Am I going crazy, or am I just going around the same circle yet again?

Sometimes I wonder whether it is boredom or true fast forward thinking. Is my life truly boring or am I just discontent? After some introspection I have to admit that neither boredom, nor discontentment is causing my problems. In fact it's just the functioning of my brain.

I guess you could say it is overly wired. You could say there are more connections that there need to be. And these connections create instant images, causing me to know the answer for question before someone has even had a chance to ask it.

I guess this brain of mine also the reason why I look at the world the way I do; seeing all interconnections, identifying cause and effect. Add my multidimensionality into this picture and you can see why it wears me down. Switching perspective from being human to observing humanity as a whole is a feature that is not available to the general public, for very good reasons.

But then again that is allowing for a very third dimensional rationalisation of what is going on to overrule the simple truth, blaming it all on physics from our limited perspective here on planet Earth. The Truth is, is that my brain is perfectly equipped for my mission here on Earth and if functioning like that of many others, is also here to succeed. It is just challenging me to keep switching between 3rd and 5th gear. But I will get the hang of it; just have to stay in 4th until I figure it all out.