Languagelessness

Sometimes words just get in the way. Have you noticed how hard it is to truly express your feelings without people accusing you of being judgemental. Sometimes I think it would be so much easier if we no longer needed words to communicate. Too many words have negative connotations when they should just really be seen as a neutral descriptive.

I have also noticed, that more and more often, words cannot express what I want to say, (not good news for a writer!), but I do find it difficult at times to find words that are not going to be misunderstood.

Look back at the history of mankind. Most wars started over the misinterpretation of words. So many stories and quotes of people have been altered for the benefits of those in power. Are there any words left that have not been abused or that have not been used to abuse? The only word that strongly stands out and is free of polarity is the word 'LOVE', since love when unconditionally displayed and expressed can never be mistaken for anything else.

And yet the power of words seems to be ever increasing. It all started with God creating the world with his words. And now it is up to us...can you deal with that responsibility? The power of divinity lies in the ability to materialise words, thus great caution is required when applying your powers of creation

We use words to create our realities, we use intentions or affirmations. All require cautiousness since it is most important to choose the right words. Phrase all words in the positive; believe what you are creating with all your heart and the miracles will happen.

I have practised a lot in creating miracles yet my success rate is far from a perfect 100%. But I cherish my successes and I use my creative powers to make myself a better world. More frequently I simply spread love and light.....the safest words to use in all creations, and as always, in accordance with my inner wisdom for the highest good of all.
